Some say that the balance of power within the EU is good, that corruption, greed and self-interest control the West. Others say that the Western world, and in particular the EU, is a place of hate and hostility, where the enemy has become us. Neither is true. In Western democracy the individual has power, and in that power, the potential for good is greater than the potential for evil. I believe that the current political landscape is a struggle between those who are confused about what democracy is and those who have found a way to manipulate the public's innate desire for freedom for the benefit of themselves and their own special interest. It is the members of the political elite who seek to establish an agenda for their leadership. This is what happened to the DLP in the mid-1980s. In the early 1980s there was great hope in the Far Right, especially among some members of the German Bundestag (the German federal parliament) that the true Right would make it into government. In the German state of Bavaria, there was a proposal to establish a parliamentary system in which a very Right Wing party would dominate. This plan was not accepted by the political elite, and it was hoped that those who succeeded in the state government in Erlangen (the capital of Bavaria) would be more moderate in their views. This expectation was not met, as the new party leader, Thomas Ebert, proved himself to be a hardline extremist. As this and other similar events had taken place before, the Right wing and extreme Right wing members of the German parliament were understandably disheartened by the events. In the wake of this frustration they formed a new party called the German National Front. In 1985, there were eight political parties represented in the Bundestag. These included the Christian Democratic Union (CDU), the Social Democratic Party of Germany (SPD), the 82157476af
